INTRODUCTION

THE TRAP EVERY MAN THINKS HE CAN BEAT

"She's different with me." — The most expensive sentence a man will ever say.

You know exactly how it starts. You meet a woman who's going through it. Maybe she's drinking too much. Maybe she's got a past she won't talk about, a father who was never there, a bank account that's always on empty. She's beautiful, she's fun, and underneath all of it you can see someone who just needs the right man to come along and steady her.

And you think: that man is me.

You'll be patient. You'll be consistent. You'll show her what a real man looks like, and slowly she'll become the woman you know she can be. You've seen it in your head a hundred times.

I know why you're here. You've fallen into the trap that many men have fallen into: you thought you could save her. I'm not here to judge you for it. I'm here for you, because I've done the exact same thing. More than once.

> A broken woman usually stays broken. Not because she can't change, but because she won't look where the change has to happen.

This book will show you why the savior plan almost never works, what actually happens on the rare occasion that it does, and the only three moves that make sense when a broken woman walks into your life looking for a hero.

Let's get into it.

CHAPTER ONE

KING'S WISDOM'S FIRST LAW

Physics has Newton. Relationships have this. Learn it before it learns you.

Men have been warned about this for centuries, in many different languages. The old saying is blunt: you can't turn a hoe into a housewife. Here's what's wild. Many of the men who know that saying, who'd repeat it to their friends without blinking, turn around and try to do exactly that.

Why? Because every one of them believes he's the exception. In fact, he is the rule. The man who thinks he's the exception is the most common man in this entire story.

THE LAW

If you remember any physics, there's a principle called Newton's First Law: an object at rest tends to stay at rest. It keeps doing what it's doing until something acts on it. I'm going to give you a law of my own.

KING'S WISDOM'S FIRST LAW

A BROKEN WOMAN USUALLY STAYS BROKEN.

HOW SHE GOT HERE

It starts with an initial phase of trauma. Something in her environment hit her hard and impacted her negatively. That part isn't her fault. What decides where she ends up is the second part: how she handles it. And in a lot of cases, she handles it poorly.

Here's the pattern. When it comes to internal problems, many women are terrible problem solvers, because they reach for the same fix every single time.

THE PROBLEM	HER "SOLUTION"
Drug problem	Hoe phase
Drinking problem	Hoe phase
Daddy issues	Hoe phase
Overweight	Hoe phase
Depression	Hoe phase
Broke	Hoe phase

And the worst part is that it doesn't solve the problem. It compounds it. When the phase is over she still has the same drinking, the same daddy issues, the same depression, the same empty bank account, plus a higher body count, which lowers her value. She comes out the other side worse off than she went in.

WHAT SHE'S REALLY AFTER

Contrary to popular belief, it's not about the sex. At the core, what she's actually trying to do is find a man to solve her problems.

The issue is that she does it the wrong way. She leads with her sexuality, and that gets her used and left. If she led with "I like you, I want you in my life," a man would be far more likely to invest in her and help her. But she doesn't know how to approach a man like that, so it's used and left, used and left, phase after phase, until she's tired of it.

That's where you come in. And that's exactly the problem.

THE BOTTOM LINE

When she finally finds a man who'll step up, she isn't looking for a partner. She's looking for a solution. And a solution that walks in from the outside can only ever be a band-aid.

CHAPTER TWO

WHY YOU CAN'T FIX HER

Even when you do everything right, the ending is almost always the same.

As you and I both know, when you try to help a woman change her ways, it isn't a permanent solution. It's a band-aid. It holds while you're there holding it. The moment that relationship is over, notice what happens: she goes right back to the bad habits she already had.

So what's the real solution? Here's the truth of the matter: the only person who can fix a broken woman is the woman herself. And that requires three things that, in my experience, women hate.

REQUIREMENT ONE

REALITY

She has to accept that she is broken. Not “going through a phase.” Not “just having fun.” Broken. She has to look at it and understand it first, and that's the part most people never get past.

REQUIREMENT TWO

ACCOUNTABILITY

She has to own the fact that the only one who can fix her being broken is her. Not you. Not the next guy. Not the one after that. The moment she hands that job to a man, she's already stopped doing it herself.

REQUIREMENT THREE

WORK

Then she has to actually do it, day after day, when nobody is watching and nobody is making her. That may not sound like a lot to you. For her, it's a mountain.

So what's much easier for her to do? Find a man to fix it. That's why the First Law holds. She never looks inside. She's always looking everywhere else, and the internal problems never get fixed. They just get smothered under promiscuity.

WHEN YOU WIN AND STILL LOSE

Now let's say you are the exception. She comes to you wanting to change. You take her under your wing and turn her into the best version of herself she can be. You know what happens? Nine times out of ten, it's going to end badly.

When a woman believes her value has increased, she believes she has access to better options. And because you were the one who invested in her at her lowest, she now thinks: I can do better than you.

But she can't just dump you, because that would expose that she isn't actually a better person, and her new picture of herself would come crashing down into reality. So instead she makes you want to leave. She gets annoying. She gets cold. She resents you. She becomes insufferable.

And you? You've put in so much time, energy and resources that you aren't going anywhere. So now she's insufferable, you refuse to leave, and you're both miserable. All because you tried to turn a hoe into a housewife.

> Only men value investment. Women do not.
> — King's Wisdom

Still don't believe me? Picture dating a heavy woman, somewhere around 250 to 260 pounds. You motivate her, you support her, and she drops serious weight. Do you think you get to enjoy the new body? No. She leaves for somebody new, because she believes her value is higher now and she deserves better than the man who was with her at her worst.

If a woman built you up from nothing, you'd never leave her, because you'd know how hard that was. It doesn't work the other way around. That's hypergamy: the drive to trade up the moment she believes she can.

RED FLAG CHECKLIST

- Every problem in her life gets the same answer: another phase, another man.
- She leads with her sexuality instead of with interest in you.
- She's looking for someone to fix her, not working on fixing herself.
- She's never named her problem out loud without blaming someone else for it.
- Every past “change” fell apart the moment the relationship ended.

THE MINDSET SHIFT

Saving her isn't the win you think it is. If it fails, you wasted your time. If it works, her value rises in her eyes and your investment becomes the reason she leaves. Either way, you lose.

CHAPTER THREE

THE 3 MOVES WHEN SHE SHOWS UP

Stop auditioning for the role of savior. These are the only three plays on the board.

So, King's Wisdom, what do I do when one of these women comes my way? When a broken woman shows up looking for your attention and looking for something serious and long-lasting, you have three options. That's it.

MOVE ONE

IGNORE HER

You're not interested. Simple. You don't owe her an explanation, a speech or a second look.

This is the cleanest move on the board, and the one most men are least willing to make, because the savior in you sees potential. Let it go. Potential is not the same as progress, and you are not the one who has to turn one into the other.

MOVE TWO

KEEP IT PHYSICAL AND KEEP IT MOVING

If you choose to engage, keep it casual and walk away before you start investing. No rescue mission. No project. No “let me help you get your life together.”

The danger was never the time you spent with her. The danger is the investment: the time, energy and resources you pour in that turn into the reason you can't leave later. Don't make the deposit.

MOVE THREE

SEND HER TO FIX IT FIRST

This is the one I like, and it's only for when she has some real redeeming qualities. If there's nothing redeeming there, it's not worth it. Go back to Move One or Two. But if she does, tell her something like this:

> I appreciate what you're doing. Go fix your issues, then come back. And if you do, we can see where this goes.

Here's what happens. About 98% of the women you say that to will never come back, because, once again, a broken woman usually stays broken.

But the other 2%, the minority of the minority, come back with something you could never have given them: proof that they can fix their own internal problems. They did it without you holding the band-aid. That gives you a much better foundation to build on, and that is a very valuable woman to have, provided the problems weren't too severe to begin with.

THE BOTTOM LINE

Don't be the repair shop. Be the reward at the end of the repair.

FINAL WORDS

STOP TRYING TO SAVE HER.

I know, I know. You think you can change her. You think she's different. Good luck to you, my guy, but I've tried it at least three times, and every single time it failed, even when I thought I understood women.

I didn't get burned. I didn't get ruined. I didn't get destroyed. But I still failed. And anything that is not a success is a failure.

So remember the law: a broken woman usually stays broken. The only person who can change that is her, through reality, accountability and work. When she shows up looking for a savior, you have three moves: ignore her, keep it physical and keep moving, or send her to fix it first. Simple as that.

Your time, your energy and your resources are an investment. Only make them where they'll be valued.
